I found the answer here, let's see what this does! Google has been rolling out a new archive system for its search index. Changes from mid-2016 include using a new service, an optimized Search API and an improved mobile UI. We've already seen the first reports of some unexpected changes to the search results for some queries. Google has also confirmed that the rollout is still ongoing. "The changes we've announced over the past few weeks include a new archive system to store crawled data and use a new service to fetch that data to improve load times. If you're having any performance issues – in terms of download times – you can also check that your IP address is not being blocked," says Dianne Brady of the Search Quality team. Although these new changes have been happening for some time, they appear to have begun being rolled out in earnest in the past couple of weeks. Google started releasing details of the new page load times for desktop and mobile a couple of months ago. 9:32 Safer Internet Week: Vulnerability Research Safer Internet Week: Vulnerability Research Safer Internet Week: Vulnerability Research ChrisW explained last years How to find and fix vulnerabilities. There is a button which opens a thread and start the server. This button is activated when a UDP client is connected to the server. When the server is closed, the server must automatically disconnect the client. I would like to know where I can find documentation to implement this step? Do you have any idea about that? I am really stuck right now. Thanks. A: In short: Create your own handler-objects that respond to datagrams received on your UDP socket. You must set some kind of flag telling the datagrams whether your server is shutting down or is still available. When a client receives a datagram, check the flag, and if your server was still active f678ea9f9e
